Con Corazón Outreach Report

14th April 2025 – Marampaqui

The rain in the Andes at 4,000 meters asl is cold, sharp, and relentless. Unlike the gentle showers of lower altitudes, this mountain rain cuts through clothing and transforms the landscape. Roads turn to mud. When this happens, we continue the journey on foot.

Reaching the medical center in these conditions is a true test. The air is thin, every step feels heavy, and the cold rain adds to the strain. What pushes us forward is knowing people are waiting: mothers with children, elders in pain, communities without other access to care. When we finally arrive, smiles and warm tea greet us. Gratitude replaces exhaustion, and the purpose behind the struggle becomes clear.

Providing healthcare here isn't easy, but it's profoundly rewarding. Each visit reminds us that true impact requires effort and dedication. The rain, the mud, the walk, these are small sacrifices for the trust we build and the lives we touch. In the high Andes, hardship and connection go hand in hand.

We found out that there are only 5 students in the elementary school nearby Marampaqui. We were told that most of the former students families have moved to a different town.
